There may still be people who will find it odd that someone like Uglow, a distinguished biographer and the author of The Lunar Men an award-winning book on a group of 18th-century amateur scientists who "made the future", should descend to a subject as apparently mundane as gardening. Her speciality was rural life, and among her wonderfully detailed and informative books are Made in England The Countryman's England and the classic Food in England I started reading in October.

Rugby union. And they have always written in a lively way about their gardens in their letters and diaries. These snippets and the engaging tone lift the book beyond a mere historical account. Seller Inventory NEW
